

Call for Papers

Medien Journal. Zeitschrift für Kommunikationskultur
Vierteljahreszeitschrift der Österreichischen Gesellschaft für Kommunikationswissenschaft (ÖGK) Heft 4/2011

Special Issue:

„Changing democracy: Journalism, civic participation and ICTs“
Deadline Full Papers: June 30, 2011

This special issue of the Medien Journal, the peer-reviewed quarterly journal of the Austrian Communication Association (OGK), is published on the occasion of a symposium which is jointly organized by the Euromedia Research Group, the Department of Communication and the ICT&S Center, both University of Salzburg, and open to the scientific community in the field. This issue of the journal will embrace selected papers from the symposium combined with submissions from a broader community.

The topic:

The latest wave of Internet development, the so-called participatory technologies, embracing user/citizen-enabling tools like wikis, blogs, social media and social networks (Web 2.0-technologies), challenge traditional forms of representative democracy, lead to a revival of ideas about a new (digital) civil society and/or to a digital public sphere. Will the hopes for a more democratic and balanced society materialize, or will those developments follow the same paths of professionalization and commercialization like many other media and communication revolutions in the past?

We encourage submissions covering the broad scope from challenges for professional journalism/traditional mass media and the development of public or citizen journalism or communities/networks, diverse modes of civic participation from bottom-up and grassroots initiatives to collaborative government on open data basis, to new participatory ICT-applications and their contribution to democratization. Are participatory technologies sustainable and reliable allies in the struggle for more and better democracy? What are the social, economic, political, and technological frames and conditions for certain developments, can we observe a shift of power from the political elite to the citizen? Which capabilities are required to benefit from those developments?

Which theories and methodological approaches are available to adequately inquire the reshaping of democracy by the means of participatory technologies? How can we overcome the classic shortcomings of the highly acclaimed trans-, multi-, or interdisciplinary research and move towards real disciplinary cooperation?

Papers, addressing the above mentioned problems, both theoretical and empirical, are welcomed. Especially, interdisciplinary approaches, introducing diverse subjects and disciplines into the core-field of communication are appreciated.

Criteria for submissions:

- The submitted texts must not be published in this form in other media (original texts only)
- Papers are supposed to range between 3000 and 4.500 words
- Submissions must contain a 10-lines abstract and a 3-lines biographical note for each author
- The formal criteria for the submission must follow APA style guides (see www.apastyle.org)
- Texts can be submitted in English or German language. German texts must follow the citation guidelines published under www.ogk.at (http://www.uni-salzburg.at/portal/page?_pageid=1947,815605&_dad=portal&_schema=PORTAL)

Deadline for submissions: June 30, 2011

Please send submissions to

Jo Trappel
Dept. Of Communication
University of Salzburg
josef.trappel@sbg.ac.at

Ursula Maier-Rabler
ICT&S Center
University of Salzburg
ursula.maier-rabler@sbg.ac.at

Manuscripts which have been submitted to Medien Journal must not be published elsewhere until the peer-review process is finished.